Not illustrated. 1854 Excerpt: . whether they are learning habits of good behaviour or the reverse; whether they are growing up with the tastes and desires of rational beings, or with those of mere animal life. And yet without the parents co-operation our schoolmasters can do little or nothing. Our only hope, then, is to make the parents in some way see that education will bring present advantage with it, of a sort that they can appreciate; that it will pay well to send their children to school; that it will bring them into favourable notice, and so help to procure for them good situations when they leave school. These are the arguments that they can understand, and it is of these that we must avail ourselves in dealing with such people. I confidently hope that the Weaver prizes may be of good service in this direction; and that it will be shown by a yearly increase in the number qualified by steady attendance at school to compete for them. Those sixteen boys who were examined at Northwich last month would go home and tell their friends that they had been examined by a gentleman who had come all the way from London, and that five of the Trustees were there to hear them examined, and had told them to be good lads, and to mind their lessons, and that if they did well next year they might each hope to obtain a prize, only they must take care to...
